

Forrest Sawyer has long been recognized as one of the most experienced and credible broadcast journalists of our day. He brings his vast media expertise, creativity, and integrity to Sawyer Media, where his responsibilities include leading the integration of legacy and new media production with emerging digital technologies.

Forrest Sawyer is a veteran journalist who joined NBC News in October 2000 as an anchor and contributor for both the broadcast network and the 24-hour cable news network MSNBC. He played a chief role in the 2000 presidential campaign and election coverage and has reported major breaking news stories. He is the chief substitute anchor for The News with Brian Williams and, together with Sawyer Media, he produces numerous MSNBC documentaries. Erik Sorenson, Vice President and General Manager of MSNBC said upon Sawyer's arrival at NBC News, "His journalistic versatility, including his experience covering major news events around the globe will be a tremendous asset for our coverage."

In addition to his assignments with NBC and MSNBC, Sawyer also reports for the acclaimed PBS documentary program Frontline and the Discovery Channel. He has recently anchored a year-long Discovery initiative on violence in America, including a nationwide town meeting; a Frontline report on the impact of homophobia; as well as a live broadcast from the South Pacific's Bikini Atoll, where the United States conducted 54 nuclear tests.

Prior to joining NBC News, Sawyer spent 11 years with ABC News, where he reported numerous exclusives from every corner of the earth. He anchored the award-winning primetime news magazines ABC Saturday Night, Day One, and Turning Point. For many years, he was the anchor of World News Su...
